According to UCAS (the Universities and Colleges Admissions Services), a record 34.1% 18-year-olds entered university in 2019. Government data for 2017/18 suggests just over half (50.2%) of those aged 18-30 year-old take part in higher education - a target set all the way back in the 1990s under Tony Blair.

Simply put, this means around a third of 18-year-olds will start university this year and that, at the moment, about half the population takes part in higher education reaching the age of 30. It's important to remember that higher education doesn't necessarily mean following the standard university path - particularly with the advent of higher and degree apprenticeships.

University is a good choice for your children if they want the “uni experience”: Living semi-independently, making new friends with very different people, joining clubs and societies - these are all things that university can offer. Moreover, it is suitable for them if they love their subject. They want to throw themselves into their studies because they love their chosen subject, and want to know everything there is to know about it. Finally, if they want to go into a profession only accessible via university: There are certain careers that are currently only accessible via a university degree (or only widely accessible this way). This includes medicine, veterinary medicine, teaching and architecture.
